

Communication@SU

Let your interest in communication and creative expression lead you to a major ... and career!

Employers consistently identify communication skills as the most important characteristic they are looking for in new hires. With the rise in new communication methods and technologies, quality writing, effective speaking and the ability to both inform and persuade have never been more important.

Salisbury University prepares students well for this new world of communication. Selected by The Princeton Review as one of its "Great Schools for Communication Majors," SU boasts an 18,500-square-foot Integrated Media Center for video and audio creation.

SU students excel in creative writing as well. In one recent semester, students published over 40 creative pieces or book reviews in national magazines, and many received fully funded teaching assistantships to continue on to graduate work.

Students in communication-related programs are also in high demand in the region as teachers, marketers and designers.

Students interested in communication and creative expression choose careers in public relations, event planning, journalism, market research, advertising, high school teaching, political campaign management, museum curation and non-profit management.

In a recent survey, SU graduates in these fields were selected for jobs or internships with employers like iHeart Radio, AmeriCorps, Walt Disney World and the Daily Times.

Students also continued on to graduate schools like University of Southern California (film), Georgetown (journalism) and New Mexico State (creative writing).

If you are a great communicator and want to hone your skills for a career in these fields, explore SU's programs!
